European Union leaders can impose trade sanctions on Iran for "Iranian proliferation activities" by rejecting French and British terms for a possible deal, according to a draft of an EU statement. "At the European Union level, the use of any nuclear material for research or the development of a nuclear explosive device would constitute a proliferation risk and would be a violation of UN Security Council Resolutions and General Agreement on Atomic Energy," said the draft text on non-proliferation leaked to foreign media Friday. "The EU would aim to freeze assets and take trade or economic sanctions against Iran." The European Union failed to reach an agreement on Iran's nuclear program on Friday after Britain, France, and Germany backed away from a deal in exchange for an easing of sanctions. The deal, proposed by the three EU partners, would have lifted nuclear-related sanctions on Iran in exchange for continuing modest sanctions on Iran's ballistic missile and arms trade. British Foreign Minister William Hague warned Friday that a rejection would create a fresh crisis in the Middle East. "In the absence of a complete deal, we are looking very hard at how best to impose limited additional [sanctions] that will continue to focus on the Iranian regime's efforts to develop a nuclear weapon," Hague told reporters at a meeting of foreign ministers in Strasbourg. "I think that quite a lot of countries around the world think that the last thing the world needs is the collapse of the nuclear agreement between the P5+1 and Iran," he said. The EU statement on nuclear proliferation in the lead-up to the discussions agreed Friday included the language on non-proliferation. British Foreign Secretary William Hague said Friday in Strasbourg that a rejection of the EU terms would make it harder to find a replacement for the deal. Dismissing claims by the British and French that the EU was split over the deal, Hague said, "We are united in our view." I think that quite a lot of countries around the world think that the last thing the world needs is the collapse of the nuclear agreement between the P5+1 and Iran. A review of the medical literature shows that the homeless are at increased risk for heavy drinking and alcohol-related medical conditions. Since the healthcare providers routinely encounter this population of clients, they may be in a position to provide treatment for heavy drinking. This paper explores the issues for the healthcare provider in light of the existing literature and describes a strategy for assessing and intervening with this population. The recognition of alcoholism as a major health problem among homeless persons must prompt a reexamination of the well-established views about the nature of alcoholism as well as the stigma faced by the homeless in treatment settings. The need for a standardized assessment tool suitable for use among homeless alcoholics as well as research that examines how the homeless population reacts to treatment interventions are also identified.Federal Reserve Bank of Minneapolis The Federal Reserve Bank of Minneapolis was established in 1914 in Minneapolis, Minnesota.
