And, if you wish, you can receive desktop notifications or alerts at a particular time or program. 1. Field of the Invention This invention relates to a method and apparatus for the optical detection of particles. 2. Discussion of the Art In the use of certain biological and chemical tests it is often required to detect the presence of a component within a sample. For example, in the medical field it is often necessary to determine the presence of a particular hormone or other protein within a patient's blood. In similar fashion, in the chemical or pharmaceutical industries it is frequently required to determine the presence of a particular impurity within a sample. The above-described tests for presence of a particular component within a patient's blood or the like is particularly critical in the medical field. It is particularly important to prevent an inadvertent misdiagnosis of a patient's condition due to an erroneous analysis. In the medical field it is also often necessary to determine the physical characteristics of the blood being analyzed. Particularly in the determination of blood clotting time, it is important to accurately and reliably determine blood clotting time. Although such physical properties are easily determined in the case of de-fibrinated blood, the presence of fibrin in blood frequently makes the determination of blood clotting time difficult. In the past, various techniques have been developed for the detection of the presence of a particular component in a sample, e.g. the presence of a particular protein or the presence of a particular impurity in a sample. The simplest and least accurate technique for determining the presence of a particular component involves the use of a colorimetric test. Typically such tests
