CHICAGO — “We’re talking about a society that’s evolving. If you want to stay static, you’re going to find yourself on the wrong side of history.” Despite declining attendance, and a marked shift in how evangelicals view their role in American society, the influence of conservative Christianity remains strong. It’s even been expressed by a Nobel Prize winner in economics. Wendell Berry, a legend in his native Kentucky and renowned nature writer, received the Nobel Prize for literature this year. After he announced the award, the world-renowned theologian and philosopher, James Cone, said that a great divide exists between religious conservatives and liberal, modern Christians. “The influence of fundamentalism is waning,” said Cone, author of several books on the history of black Christian thought and social action, including Black Theology and Black Power. Cone added that the influence of Christians who emphasize “traditional values” such as “traditional marriage, traditional families, traditional gender roles” is weakening. “It’s an interesting time,” Cone said, “theologically speaking.” That’s clearly the perception of Berry, a stalwart of rural Kentucky’s Christian and civil rights movement. In a letter to the Daily Herald, a Kentucky newspaper, Berry expressed his views on the future of the church: “The power of the church is most directly expressed in its relationship with its creation. I find much that is hopeful in the relationship between the church and the earth. We ought not to destroy that which we love.” More than 40 years ago, Berry spoke about “the sin of dominion” and the responsibility of Christians to be stewards of the earth. His words, he said, are “still profoundly prophetic.” The church is a force for good in the world, Berry continued, but some people are “not going to be changed by it.”

What's New in the Our Earth For Windows 8?

With "Our Earth for Windows 8", our first apps for Windows 8, we present a simple but rich set of images of our planet. Each image can be viewed in full screen, in high quality, with the possibility to use it as a lock screen. Our planet earth is not a one-dimensional mass, but a complex system that exhibits a great deal of diversity. In order to highlight this diversity, our first app for Windows 8 is inspired by a perspective called the "evolutionary landscape". Each image shows a single location, chosen because it's representative of a specific way of life, a specific landscape, a specific flora and fauna. Thus, the user can quickly become aware of the diversity of our planet. Notes: Each image is part of an absolute, the pictures, taken in the field, have been rated by the photographer. Additional information: Each image is interactive: simply touch the image to zoom, to fly from place to place, and to change the projection of the image (ultra-wide, panoramic, or real time 3D). The project contains 21 pictures taken by the photographer Robert G. Johnston, depicting various parts of the planet, in order to offer the user an immersive experience that will leave a deep impression.
